

A RISKY INJECTION

by Sara Mould

There's a new varicose vein treatment that might be damaging to your health.

Most women dream of smooth sexy legs, but at what cost? According to recent studies published in Cephalagia medical journal, a new varicose vein treatment called Polidocanol foam has major side effects.

The procedure is quite easy. You check into a day hospital, go under general anesthetic and they inject you with Polidocanol foam. The foam causes clotting which then closes off the varicose vein. By the end of the day patients are able to check out and carry on with their daily lives.

But it really isn't that simple. The medical journal states that patients complained of intense migraines, nausea and temporary blindness. The study also revealed that most of the patients were between the ages of 40-50 years.

More research still needs to be concluded but as this research continues to develop, a caution to the wise: rather wait a couple of years before trying out this new treatment.

For more information contact:

The headache clinic on 0861 678 911 or visit

www.headacheclinic.co.za